More Pheasants Flying

Pheasant hunters in Western New York found increased numbers of birds during the fall, according to reports received by members of the Region Eight Fish and Wildlife Management Board (FWMB).

The board consists of legislator, sportman and landowner representatives from Chemung, Genesee, Livingston, Monroe, Ontario, Orleans, Schuyler, Seneca, Steuben, Wayne and Yates counties.

The reason for the population increase, according to Stu Ackerman, chairman of the FWMB Wildlife Habitat Committee, may well be improved nesting habitat. A combination of reduced acreage in cultivated crops and an increase in the acreage managed specifically for wildlife may account for the resurgence.

Landowners in the Lake Plains Region of New York have planted nearly 6,000 acres to wildlife nesting cover. In addition, an increasing number of acres are being managed for pheasants and other wildlife.

Ackerman of Rochester, John Andrews of Waterloo and Paul Wood of Batavia, members of the FWMB Habitat Committee, recently met with Bruce Penrod Sr., wildlife biologist with the Department of Environmental Conservation. The purpose of the meeting was to plan strategies to gain further expansion of habitat work on private lands. A goal set by the Committee is to obtain five or more new cooperators in the Wildlife Habitat Management Program during 1988 in each county in Region Eight.

Inducements to encourage landowners to participate include financial and technical assistance. Several avenues currently exist for landowners to potentially receive financial remuneration. The Conservation Reserve Program (CRP), which is part of the 1985 Farm Bill, is a federal program targeted at removing highly erodible land from agricultural production. Eligible land can be planted to desirable wildlife cover and left in this program for 10 years. The participating landowner receives cost-sharing for the establishment of the desirable cover types, as well as an annual payment to keep the acreage out of production.

The second potential revenue source is participation in the Agricultural Conservation Program (ACP). Like CRP, cost-sharing is available through ACP for developing beneficial wildlife habitat. No annual payment is available, however, under ACP.

Another means of reimbursing one's expenses is to plant switchgrass and, from part of the planting, harvest seed. Switchgrass, one of the high value habitat cover species, can return enough profit from seed harvest in one season to pay for the cost of establishing the cover. A cooperative project at the John White Game Farm and the Tonawanda Wildlife Management Area was a harvest of 20 acres of switchgrass by a seed farm from Pennsylvania. The harvest yielded 2,800 pounds of raw seed, the value of which allows the seed company to harvest the seed, provide the state 500 pounds of seed for future plantings, and, also, provide the state with technical assistance on maintaining existing grasslands.

Switchgrass is a high value cover because it grows tall and dense and does not become knocked flat to the ground by heavy snow. The stem is stiff enough to come back up after snow and ice melt. While switchgrass requires a couple of years to become established, it produces a high value seed crop that can be sold to other landowners to establish wildlife cover.

Individuals contemplating switchgrass planting for profit should obtain technical assistance from county agricultural agents.

Girl Cagers In Tourney At Livonia

Coach Pat Shafer's Dansville High team dropped a pair of decisions in the girls' tournament hosted by Livonia last week.

Dansville fell 39-25 to Livonia in the opening round and then lost 37-17 to Bishop Kearney in the consolation game.

Against Livonia, Tricia Hurlburt scored 10 points and Krista Yeager added nine. In the Kearney contest, Yeager scored seven while Kathy Wester had eight rebounds and Mary French also picked off eight.

Yeager was selected for Athlete of the Week honors for her performance in the two games. The senior co-captain provides leadership for the young Dansville squad.

Dansville went without two injured players in the tournament, Kelly Wester and Lori Hartman. Larie Sylvester, who has missed several games, is expected to rejoin the team this week.
